Annotated Bibliography Guidelines

An annotated bibliography is a bibliography in which there is a paragraph following every entry that summarizes the source’s content and its relevance to your topic. Then the description below each entry analyzes how well the source material furthers research into that particular topic. Strive for 50-200 words for each annotation. More details about what kind of information is included in an annotation is available on the links below, so check them out!

Requirements:

You need to use the Chicago Manual of Style for formatting. Two helpful links which include examples are:

and:

You will need at least ten published sources of either books or peer reviewed journals. However, more are encouraged! Be as thorough as you can, considering that you need to have the source available to assess it yourself. If there is a source that you cannot get but you think needs mentioning (because of its prevalent citation in other sources, for example), then add it and explain the lack of access in the annotation.

Please also include other documents that you found useful/of interest, such as film (i.e. documentaries) and websites (such as those of museums or artists).

As always, be sure to alphabetize your entries, and that all text under each author’s name is indented with a “hanging” tab.
